The assimilation of multiple dietary components by Paralvinella naorensis is regulated by regulatory protein genes, the synthesis of which is cell-density dependent. Paralvinellae are gill symbionts of marine invertebrates including molluscs, echinoderms and crustaceans. The diversity and relative abundance of Paralvinella species vary among hosts.

This study describes the molecular mechanisms controlling the growth and differentiation of Paralvinella naorensis, a species belonging to the Paralvinellinae subfamily. Ingestion of the algal food source Chlorella is quantitatively controlled by the synthesis of a regulatory gene, but it is not regulated by cell-density. Indeed, the expression level of the translation initiation factor gene is regulated by cell-density. This regulation was not observed in the case of the regulatory gene expressing two polysomal binding protein homologues. Although the cells at the stationary phase have the same amount of the regulatory and translation initiation factor genes, their translation is modulated differently, indicating the presence of cell-density-dependent regulation. The 5' UTR of the translation initiation factor gene has a similar nucleotide composition to that of the regulatory gene and contains cell-density-dependent regulatory elements. The results suggest that, for Paralvinella species, the synthesis of regulatory and translation initiation factor genes is differentially regulated and may be cell-density-dependent. Jason Bour

It is located in Cotonou, Benin. The center is a Peace Support Operations (PSO) Base. The current director of the Global CCC is Lt.-Col. (Ret.) Edwin Y. Monteo, who is also deputy director of the U.S. Transportation Command. The Global CCC was created as a result of the 58th G7 summit in Montebello, Canada. The Global CCC's headquarters are at the U.N. Office of Support to Peace Operations in Benin City, Nigeria. The Global CCC has a role in the transition of countries, to allow for stabilization.
